Brothers and was later made into HBO series of the same title. Norm is mentioned in this book on page 261 and also appears twice in the HBO series talking about his experiences.

Norm returned to the United States to get married, raise a family and work in the insurance business eventually starting the Tri-County Insurance Agency. Norm also continued to serve in the Army Reserve and was an alumnus of the 84th Division USAR. Norm and Lucille often attended 84th Railsplitters Association events and was honored as one of our special members.

Neitzke was one of “Band of Brothers”

Many U.S. Army infantry companies fought the Germans in Europe, but only one is known as the band of brothers.

Norm Neitzke was one of those brothers in Easy Company of the Army's 506th Regiment, 101st Airborne immortalized in the Stephen Ambrose bestseller "Band of Brothers," which later became an HBO miniseries.

Sent as a replacement to fill out the unit that lost many men in the D-Day invasion and Battle of the Bulge, Neitzke, in a 2006 Journal Sentinel interview, vividly recalled entering a German concentration camp and his fear when hearing German artillery rounds pass over his head.

Neitzke died Monday, December 8, 2008 of a heart attack at the insurance agency in Milwaukee where he worked part-time. The World War II hero from Menomonee Falls was 82.

A Milwaukee native who skipped his Washington High School graduation to go to boot camp, Neitzke joined Easy Company in February 1945. One of the more poignant scenes in the book and series is when the unit enters a concentration camp.

"One of the duties was to pick up food for the concentration camp victims. We found out later we were doing the wrong thing, because they would eat themselves to death," Neitzke recalled. "We had these big wheels of cheese almost as big as a tire. So we had to take it away right after giving it to them. It kind of made you think why I went to fight. We said, 'Now we know,' after seeing the concentration camp victims."

He's mentioned on page 261 of the book in a passage where he and other soldiers decide to take a German ambulance, and he appears twice in the HBO series talking about his experiences. Neitzke's assessment of the book and series was that both were realistic, though with a few exaggerations. And he was surprised that Easy Company would end up garnering so much fame.

"We always felt there were a lot of other good units we met up with. There are about 100 infantry companies, and all of them were very good. It just so happened we were one of the units that Stephen Ambrose wrote about," Neitzke said.

Neitzke returned home to Wisconsin following the war, got married, raised a family and worked as an insurance salesman, eventually starting Tri-County Insurance Agency in Milwaukee. He and his wife, Lucille, celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary Thursday.

Neitzke served in the Army Reserve for several decades and volunteered his time with numerous veterans groups.

"He was really a soldier's soldier. He really enjoyed talking to other vets," said Robert Sorrell, a retired Coast Guard chief warrant officer.

The night after their wedding anniversary, the couple attended an awards banquet in West Allis for the Milwaukee NCO Council, a local veterans group, and Neitzke spoke about his World War II experiences.

"At some point in the last couple years he really made a conscious decision to start talking and pass down that history to as many people as possible," said his son-in-law Jim Cross.

His daughter Colleen Cross remembers her summers were always centered on the 101st Airborne reunions in various states.

"I knew that my summer vacation would be surrounded by veterans of the 101st, and we would always stop at the hospitality room for the 506th," said Colleen Cross, adding that Ambrose wrote "Band of Brothers" after visiting one of the reunions.

Her father was "very surprised, very honored" by the popularity of the book and series. "It was timing. They were at one of the 506th reunions and the author happened to be in the area and decided to come in and do some interviews," she said.
